

Valid Points: We have you only have commercial radio and an NPR station, and little to no local news on the radio, produced from my town

Low power radio is an opportunity available for young people and community members to learn the ins-and-outs of broadcasting. We have no stations run by volunteers or any training programs where teenagers, church groups, or elderly folks can pick up a microphone and share their views with the community.

Many local stories are not covered well by the local media. The presence of a community radio station, broadcasting at the time of the event would change the town's perception of what had happened.
